Covered markets

Shopping in ancient buildings

The market hall culture developed in the metropolis on the Spree as early as the 19th century and so weekly shopping in the historic buildings often becomes a little journey through time. Visit Markthalle Neun in Kreuzberg, where over 120 years after its inauguration, many traders offer mainly organic and regional products. Discover the latest food trends on "Streetfood Thursday". In the Arminiusmarkthalle in Moabit, you can buy fresh food and handicrafts. With its columns and Gothic arched windows, the listed building from 1891 looks almost like a cathedral and makes the hearts of architecture lovers beat faster during a shopping spree.

Tegel indoor market

The markets in Tegel's pedestrian zone can look back on a century of tradition. Not only fruit and flowers are on sale here from Mondays to Saturdays from the stands of the countless traders – there's traditional handicraft as well.

Marheineke Markthalle

The Marheineke Markthalle is as much a part of Kreuzberg as the TV Tower is a part of Alexanderplatz. The market hall has a long history as does the vibrant neighbourhood surrounding Bergmannstraße. The market offers meat, cheese, milk, bread, fish, juices, fruits, vegetables and flowers over an extensive 3,000 m² area. The stands feature organic products from the local region as well as international delicacies. There are plenty of options to satisfy your hunger in and around the market hall with its numerous snack stands, cosy cafés and the Restaurant Matzbach.
